

The Stickleback Fish - A Story of Modern Evolution

Sticklebacks are a great fish because they evolve really fast. In contrast to other species, sticklebacks adapt to changes in their environment much faster than most other fish. This is because they have a lot of genetic variation, which means they can change their shape, size, and color to fit in with their surroundings.

Background

One of the most famous examples of modern evolution is the stickleback fish, which has changed its shape and color to fit in with its environment.

1. How did the stickleback fish evolve? The stickleback fish evolved from a common ancestor that lived in the ocean. Over time, the fish that lived in the ocean changed their shape and color to fit in with their environment.

2. How did the stickleback fish evolve to live in freshwater? The stickleback fish evolved to live in freshwater because they had a lot of genetic variation, which means they could change their shape and color to fit in with their environment.

3. How did the stickleback fish evolve to live in different environments? The stickleback fish evolved to live in different environments because they had a lot of genetic variation, which means they could change their shape and color to fit in with their environment.

4. How did the stickleback fish evolve to live in different environments? The stickleback fish evolved to live in different environments because they had a lot of genetic variation, which means they could change their shape and color to fit in with their environment.
